Market Week: September 28, 2026

The Markets (as of market close September 25, 2026)

Stocks closed last week generally higher as tech and AI shares attracted investors, while Treasury yields continued to rise as a notable sell-off pulled bond prices lower. This result is likely due to traders trying to balance strong corporate earnings and solid economic momentum with stubborn inflation and the likelihood of additional Federal Reserve policy tightening. Among the market sectors, information technology, health care, industrials, and communication services performed well, while the remaining sectors ended the week in the red. Ten-year Treasury yields hovered near their highest levels in roughly 20 years. Crude oil prices eased on renewed hopes of a peace deal between the U.S. and Iran.

Eye on the Week Ahead

There's plenty of market-moving economic information being released this week. The final estimate for the second quarter gross domestic product is out this week. The previous report showed the economy expanded at a rate of 1.5%. Also available is the report on personal income and expenditures, which includes the personal consumption expenditures price index, a measure of inflation. The week ends with the Employment report for September.
